Amnesia is the total or partial loss of memory. Questions such as, where you come from, where you belong, or, what your purpose is, no longer create an immediate reality and recognizable identity. Postmodernism has created a somewhat universal amnesia. The postmodern worldview, with its narcissistic individualism, pluralism, deconstructionism, and loss of common consciousness, has gradually reduced the essential means by which we have identified ourselves in the past. The lack of common “identifiers” has often found an expression in the now global question, “Who in the world am I?”

In this context of global uncertainties one group has provided the world with elements of stability; stable growth, growing significance, significant change: the Pentecostal movement. But Pentecostalism is plagued by the same problems. As the 18th Pentecostal World Conference in Seoul (1998) already acknowledged, at the beginning of the twenty-first century the question, “Who in the world are Pentecostals?” has become one of the

---

1 This article was presented at the 29th meeting of the Society for Pentecostal Studies, Kirkland, Washington, March 18, 2000. I am particularly referring to the concept of “cultural memory,” defined by Jan Assmann as a response to the question “What must we never and under no circumstances forget?” in Das kulturelle Gedächtnis (Munich: C. H. Beck, 1997), pp. 22-45, 77.

2 I use the term “postmodern” as an expression of the sociological, philosophical, and aesthetical transformation beginning in the last part of the nineteenth century.

most significant issues. That this realization comes from Asia should not surprise us. A concept has developed at the end of the twentieth century that too easily divided the religious world of Pentecostals among others into North American Pentecostalism, European Pentecostalism, and Asian Pentecostalism. Yet, particularly in Asia, the expression of Pentecostalism can differ greatly from one country to another as the result of a different cultural and historical development of Pentecostal churches and leadership and the subsequent formulation of a congruent Pentecostal theology. The situation in Asia is paradigmatic for the worldwide situation of Pentecostalism. It expresses the most urgent question Pentecostals are facing today: What is the global identity of the Pentecostal movement?

Attaining answers to these questions has become increasingly difficult.
In addition to the question of global Pentecostal self-consciousness there is also a growing awareness of a lack of terminology in order to adequately express the distinctive impressions and experiences of Pentecostalism to those outside of the movement. As a consequence, the distinctive elements of the movement are often misrepresented, its theological message misinterpreted, and its significance misjudged. A solution to the problems is not located in Asia, North America, or Europe alone. Pentecostals need to learn about themselves together in a global context. They may find that behind their different expressions lies a common foundation for a global Pentecostal identity. I want to suggest that the postmodern problem of Pentecostalism is one of memory. The “identifiers” of the past are no longer sufficient to adequately establish and preserve Pentecostal identity in the present. Pentecostals need an appropriate system that will allow them to determine and describe their global and ecumenical existence. I want to suggest that the notion of the “hierarchy of truths” is helpful in this endeavor. Thus I will first introduce the concept and evaluate it in regard to its usefulness as an ecumenical tool and for approaching Pentecostal identity. I will then apply the concept to distinctive themes of Pentecostalism and, in a final step, suggest how this is valuable for the preservation and communication of the Pentecostal tradition.

Global Context” (a paper presented at the Society for Pentecostal Studies meeting, March 1999, Springfield, MO), 34 pp.; Cf. also the presidential address of Cheryl Bridges Johns, “The Adolescence of Pentecostalism: In Search of a

The lack of theological expression has been recognized by many Pentecostal and non-Pentecostal scholars. Some who voiced this critique are Jürgen Moltmann, Michael Welker, Miroslav Volf, and others mentioned in this study.
1. A Hermeneutic of the “Hierarchy of Truths”

In 1990 a study document of the Joint Working Group (JWG) of the World Council of Churches and the Roman Catholic Church took up the notion of the “hierarchy of truths” (hierarchia veritatum), as it had been introduced in the Second Vatican’s Council’s Decree on Ecumenism (1964).\(^5\) The concept was received by many with high hopes for its implications in ecumenical dialogue. Several books and over forty articles and essays have appeared devoted to the issue; some even considered it “the most revolutionary to be found.”\(^6\) The concept is understood as an instrument of common discernment that assists the ecumenical endeavor by “more adequately assessing expressions of the truth of revelation, their interrelation, their necessity, and the possible diversity of formulations.”\(^7\) This suggests ecumenical dialogue “based upon a communion in the ‘foundation’ that already exists and will point the way to that ordering of priorities which makes possible gradual growth into full [visible] communion.”\(^8\) If understood this way, the hierarchia veritatum is indeed valuable not only for an ecumenical appreciation of Pentecostal identity but also for an evaluation of distinctive Pentecostal themes as part of that identity. A common understanding of the concept appears to be one of its primary presuppositions. The post-conciliar literature suggests, however, that the ecumenical use of the concept must begin with a proper hermeneutic of its terms.

The study document of the JWG points to the history of the church as evidence for the existence of a certain hierarchical understanding of

---

\(^7\) “The Notion of Hierarchy of Truths,” p. 569.

\(^8\) “The Notion of Hierarchy of Truths,” p. 568.
The foundation of this hierarchy is the “mystery of Jesus Christ” as the fundamental truth to which all other elements of the hierarchy are related in different ways. This indicates “an order of importance... according to the greater or lesser proximity” that doctrines have to that foundation. It will be imperative to begin with a clarification of the terminology employed, particularly of the central terms “hierarchy” and “truth,” in order to facilitate the use of the concept for Pentecostalism.

A systematic treatise of the concept of “truth” as it relates to the understanding of truth in general and the relation of revelation, faith, dogma, and doctrine has yet to be produced. In a postmodern context it will be increasingly difficult to work out a common, universal apparatus with which the concept of “truth” is ecumenically approached. Nevertheless, there seems to exist a certain agreement among scholars that not all truth is of the same significance. A. Pangrazio, who introduced the concept at Vatican II, distinguished between truths that belong to the order of the end and those that belong to the order of the 10 Suggestions to express the mystery have been the Kyrios Christos or early creeds of the scripture (1 Cor 15:3-8; Phil 2:5-11), the Apostolic Creed, the Nicean-Constantinopolitan Creed and others.

---

13 Mark Lowery approached the relation of doctrine and dogma as part of the concept in “The Hierarchy of Truths and Doctrinal Particularity” (Ph. D. diss., Marquette University, 1988).

14 Carlos Cardona emphasizes that all truths are true regardless of their hierarchical position, that they are further interrelated to such an extent that a hierarchical order may become a “suicidal vivisection” (vivisección suicida); “La ‘Jerarchia de las verdades’ segun el Concilio Vaticano II, y el orden de lo real,” Los movimientos teológicos secularizantes. Cuestiones actuales de metodología teológica, ed. J. A. de Aldama (Madrid: La Editorial Católica, 1973), pp. 150-59.
means of salvation. O. Cullmann distinguished between pure and impure truths, Y. Congar between truths of explicit faith and truths of implicit agreement, K. Rahner between truths necessary for and others not necessary for salvation, P. O’Connell between an ontological reality and an epistemological order of truths, W. Dietzfelbinger between central and marginal truths, and E. Schlink between eternal truth and the historical expressions of truth.

Several things are noteworthy in this debate. First, not all truths are considered as of the same “weight.” Second, the hierarchy of truths is a hermeneutical tool for the qualitative assessment of that “weight”

22 M. Lowery distinguished four views of modern scholarship that: 1) doctrines are unrelated to revealed truth; 2) doctrines are equal to revealed truths; 3) there are essential and non-essential truths; and 4) there are foundational and non-foundational truths; cf. Lowery, “The Hierarchy of Truths,” pp. 3-14.
including the re-evaluation of particular doctrines. Third, there is a common search for a possible “objective” rationale for the ordering of truths depending on their relation to a central and fundamental truth. Fourth, an adequate ordering of truths must also consider the importance of the church’s ongoing penetration into the revealed mystery. Finally, no element of truth must be excluded from the whole of the hierarchy.

“Hierarchy today is widely under attack,” as Terrence L. Nichols noted recently. However, the “crucial question is not: should there be hierarchy? Rather it is: what kind of hierarchy should there be, and how should it be structured?” “Hierarchy” implies both relationship and order among truths. This relationship is governed by a certain “foundation” in relation to which all other doctrines are ordered. Even though all “those elements which make up the Church must be kept with equal fidelity not all of them are of equal importance.”

---

29 Nichols, That All May Be One, p. 7.

Ecumenism employed two terms as aids for a conceptualization of this hierarchical relationship of truths: the term “foundation” and the term “link” (nexus).

Any description of the foundation on a conceptual level, so the recommendation of the JWG, “should refer to the person and mystery of Jesus Christ.” This endeavor, however, is limited because “no one formula can fully grasp or express its reality.” As a result, there is no ecumenical consensus as to what precisely should be identified as that foundation, and it will be one of the foremost ecumenical tasks of the coming decade to move beyond a silent agreement to an adequately voiced description. For the purpose of this study, I suggest the following description: Jesus of Nazareth, born, crucified and raised for the church, in his inseparable and co-equal relation with the Father and the Holy Spirit.

Another question which also has not been adequately explored is how other elements of Christian faith are then related to that foundation and to each another. This lack of definition suggests that various principles of evaluating and ordering truths are, in fact, permissible.

---

33 Some suggest to order doctrines on the basis of the degree of their explicitness in Scripture, others based on their necessity for salvation, and again others on the basis of their psychological or sociological functioning in a person’s belief system; cf. G. Tavard, “Hierarchia Veritatum: A Preliminary Investigation,” Theological Studies 32 (1971), pp. 278-89; Henn, “Hierarchy of Truths,” pp. 439-71.
34 This definition aims to include Trinitarian, ecclesiological and soteriological aspects; cf. these aspects in Dei Verbum 2,4,7,15; K. Rahner, “Geheimnis,” Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 2nd ed., vol. IV (Freiburg: Herder, 1960), pp. 593-97 (596); H. Mühlen, “Die Bedeutung der Differenz zwischen Zentraldogmen und Randdogmen für den ökumenischen Dialog,” in Freiheit in der Begegnung: Zwischenbilanz des Ökumenischen Dialogs, ed. J. L. Leuba (Frankfurt: Joseph Knecht, 1969), pp. 191-227 (200-205); Schützeichel, Das hierarchische Denken, pp. 101-103; Aquinas, Summa Theologica, II, q. 1, a, 6 ad 1 and a, 8, c, as well as the Nicaeno-Constantinopolitan Creed.
35 Among the various criteria suggested are the scripture, tradition, creeds, the Fathers, liturgy, the official teaching of the church, and the sensus fidelium; cf. G. Thils, “Un colloque sur le theme: la ‘hierarchie des verités’ de la foi,” Revue théologique de Louvain 10:2 (1979), pp. 245-49 (247-48).
Such an understanding seems consistent with the Roman Catholic view that “almost everyone, though in different ways, longs for the one visible church of God”. The question is, however, whether there is not one particular direction from which one can best approach the concept.

This question of directionality seems to be most important in the discussion of the relationship of truths. The literature on the hierarchy of truths shows this common agreement: that truths are ordered in their relation to the foundation and not vice versa. This does not deny a mutual relation between that foundation and other truths, however, this agreement underlines that it is in the nature of the mystery that it cannot be grasped in its entirety, its temporality, and relationality. Any communal approach to a Pentecostal “hierarchy of truths” should therefore begin not with the foundation but the elements distinctive of the Pentecostal tradition.

2. Evaluation of the Concept Hierarchia Veritatum

Inadequate and inconsistent use of terminology is largely responsible for the ecumenical neglect of the otherwise valuable concept of a hierarchia veritatum. The term “hierarchy” involves several problematic issues that are, in fact, inimical to the ecumenical spirit of the overall concept. First, “hierarchy” designates a strict and fixed system or systems of order in which the inferior are subject to the superior in their relation to the highest—not the lowest or the central—element; the terms “foundation” or “center” therefore seem inadequate. Second, a hierarchy allows for an open, indefinite continuum to the lowest but only for a

---

37 Hans Urs von Balthasar has warned that it must never be an individual who determines “what is central and what is peripheral,” Truth is Symphonic: Aspects of Christian Pluralism (San Francisco: Ignatius, 1987), p. 76.

38 Henn suggested several spatial images of which only the linear (the highpoint in a continuum) but not a circular, organic, or structural correspond to the historical and etymological reality of the term. Cf. Henn, “Hierarchy of Truths,” p. 440. Several other authors have employed the latter images and preferred a redefinition of hierarchy rather than a change of terminology. Nichols suggests a “participatory model” similar to my suggestion of a corpus; Nichols, That All May Be One, pp. 14-20.
limited, definite continuum to the highest element. This does not explicitly rule out the exclusion of some elements from the “fundamental” order or even the dispensability of others from the whole system. Further, the consistent use of the hierarchical concept may lead to the application of the principle of subordination also at the very top of the structure, that is, at the “fundamental” truth. The result of this can be a hardening of the hierarchical structure to the point of ecumenical incompatibility. Third, hierarchy explains the interrelatedness of elements only in terms of their subordination but not in regard to their overall function as part of the whole. Yet, scholars that referred to the fundamental truth as the ordering principle have repeatedly called for another, second principle of interrelatedness. Finally, the concept suggests a relation of different hierarchies at the top but allows a relation of the whole only in terms of either non-integrating tolerance or the complete integration, and thus disintegration, of one hierarchy into another. These shortcomings suggest that the term “hierarchy” is inadequate as an expression of the overall idea. In order to protect the general concept, I therefore suggest the use of the term “body” (corpus) as it embraces the ecumenical understanding of the concept both in Scripture and throughout Christian history.

40 Often under use of the euphemism “unity in (reconciled) diversity.”

The term corpus veritatum protects the general concept and offers several advantages. First, it implies an organic, variable system over against a strict, hierarchical one. Second, the use of the terms “foundation,” “core” and “center” are adequate here in that they point to the main truth as the central and foundational, that is, life-giving and sustaining element: the mystery of Christ. Third, corpus underlines the indispensability of all elements of the body. The use of the term in 1 Corinthians 12 further suggests that the ordering of truths may happen on a fluctuating scale that weighs expressions of truths according to their relative function at a given moment in order “that there should be no schism in the body, but that the members should have the same care for one another.” The term “body” allows for this kind of evaluation. Fourth, corpus implies a particular relationship of individual truths to both the life-giving center as well as to other elements. Finally, the scriptural ideals of marriage and koinonia, stressed often by Pentecostals, invite the idea of ecumenical union of different bodies of truths. With this re-formulation of the terminology involved, the basic understanding of the original concept has been preserved and purified, and it can now be applied to the question of Pentecostal identity.

3. Towards a Pentecostal Corpus Veritatum

Since the rise of modern classical Pentecostalism in the early twentieth century, the majority of approaches to the identity of the movement in North America have focused on its most distinctive feature: the practice of speaking in tongues. Efforts to assert a more characteristic identity and to contextualize the movement, however, are largely the late result of the growing charismatic movement in the 1960s,

---

44 1 Cor 12:25.
45 Following the entry on “Classical Pentecostalism” in Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1988), pp. 219-22, the term is used to distinguish early Pentecostal churches from later “Neo-” and “charismatic” Pentecostalism.
46 This was observed already by Donald W. Dayton, “Theological Roots of Pentecostalism,” Pneuma 2:1 (Spring 1980), pp. 3-49 (3).
which forced classical Pentecostalism to deal with its own identity. The visible outcome is a large amount of literature dealing with the theological, historical, or sociological themes distinctive to the movement. A unifying and ordering principle of identity, however, is still missing.

Pentecostal scholars recognized the need for an ordering principle only in the 1980s. As one of the first, William Faupel approached the issue by using the theory of “complementary models.” He suggested that models “are symbolic representations of aspects of reality that are not directly observable to us.” He understood them as provisional yet helpful for providing a “more whole understanding of reality.” In other words, Faupel was looking for a principle that related Pentecostal doctrines to the central mystery. He identified four motifs: The Full 47 The charismatic movement produced a large amount of literature, classical Pentecostalism began only subsequently to deal with the question of its own identity; cf. note 3.

---

52 Faupel, The Function of ‘Models’,” p. 70.

53 Others have followed; H. Cox suggested a re-formulation of the terms “experience” and “Spirit,” cf. Fire from Heaven (New York: Addison-Wesley, 1995), pp. 300-21. Solivan recently suggested the concept of orthopathos as the Gospel, the Latter Rain, the Apostolic Faith, and Pentecostal—with particular emphasis on such distinctive themes as divine healing, miracles, Spirit baptism, and the Second Coming of Christ. Faupel’s search for “a symbolic representation” of the mystery contained, unintentionally as it may have been, sacramental undertones that remained unrecognized.

In 1987, Donald W. Dayton pointed to a similar pattern to illuminate the theological roots of Pentecostalism: salvation, baptism in the Holy Spirit, divine healing; and the return of Christ. Anti-Pentecostal literature seems to confirm the weight of these four themes. More recently, similar Pentecostal themes were even classified as an ecumenical challenge. Dayton suggests that these “themes are well-nigh universal within the movement, appearing...in all branches and varieties of Pentecostalism” and “could also be traced outside classical Pentecostalism in the Charismatic movement or ‘neo-Pentecostalism’ and perhaps in third-world manifestations.” What is the place of these themes in a Pentecostal corpus veritatum? The attempt to evaluate these themes merely with the category of religious experience will at this time allow only for a limited understanding of their significance. However, if we also examine the position they occupy in Pentecostal teaching and worship, we will be able to more fully appreciate the role of these themes within a Pentecostal body of truths.

The four themes must be understood as only representative of a much wider and more complex system of Pentecostal doctrines. Dayton’s 54 These are the titles applied to the movement by early Pentecostals; Faupel, “The Function of ‘Models’,” p. 52.

55 Dayton, Theological Roots, pp. 21-22; cf. also his article in Pneuma 4.

emphasis was on the theological roots of the movement. Pentecostalism was subsequently forced to reassess its identity and other themes were emphasized in their own right. Recently, Harvey Cox pointed out several interrelated positive and negative characteristics of the movement; Lamar Vest has suggested eight distinctives; Cheryl Bridges Johns has outlined five elements of a mature Pentecostalism; Cecil Robeck suggested three features. The answer to the question, “Who in the world are Pentecostals?” seems to lie in a definition of these distinctive elements. However, Pentecostals must also consider the question whether that which is distinctive to Pentecostalism is also central to the movement.

The four-fold pattern allows us to approach Pentecostal identity on a substantial level. An early, clear expression of the Pentecostal themes is found in the writings of Aimee S. McPherson, who summarized them as follows: “Jesus saves us according to John 3:16. He baptizes us with the Holy Spirit according to Acts 2:4. He heals our bodies according to James 5:14-15. And Jesus is coming again to receive us unto Himself according to 1 Thessalonians 4:16-17.” This account places the four themes in a threefold order. First, the center is the person and work of Jesus of Nazareth. Second, the themes are placed distinct from this center at a certain distance. They are “not a goal to be reached...but a door...”

60 “Personal Reflections on Pentecostalism,” Pneuma 15:1 (Spring 1993), pp. 29-34.

61 Spiritual Balance: Reclaiming the Promise (Cleveland, TN: Pathway, 1994), pp. 35-36

64 D. Lyle Dabney, for example, suggests that not the fourfold theme but pneumatology as such is central to Pentecostalism; “Saul’s Armor: The Problem and the Promise of Pentecostal Theology Today” (forthcoming).

Third, the themes are related to the center through a specific link: the gospel. Scripture occupies an intermediate position between the center and the four distinctive elements of Pentecostalism. The question is in what way the scriptures relate the four themes to the central mystery.

McPherson’s summary suggests that the scriptures relate the four elements of Pentecostal experience to the central mystery through the activity of the center; in other words, through the subjectivity of the mystery of Christ and the objectivity of the distinctive Pentecostal experiences. This means, for example, that divine healing receives its position in a Pentecostal corpus veritatum through the subjectivity of the mystery of Christ rather than its own, inherent and relative degree of power, effectiveness, or frequency. In other words, the directionality is from Christ to the Pentecostal themes and not vice versa. However, Pentecostals determine the significance of the four themes still generally by their manifestations, or modes of temporality, that is, their directionality to Christ.

In 1994 Ralph Del Colle explored this directionality. As one example of the four-fold pattern, he suggested that “Spirit-Baptism incorporates the various modes of temporality in the divine experience.” He further suggests a certain incongruity: “The eternality of God as timelessness... creates and incorporates in the divine life the variable possibilities of temporality in created order” which, however, “we can...only partially realize.” In other words, the human experience is limited in its temporal perception of the divine; the directionality, I want to say, is opposite to that of a corpus veritatum. One result of this reversal is a certain disorder in the human perception and association (Zuordnung) of the divine mystery—a lack of “confirmation” of the divine order of truth in the temporality of human life, resulting in an ever-widening gap.

---

68 Del Colle, Trinity and Temporality, p. 112 (emphases not mine).
between the human experience of the divine temporality and the eternality of the divine mystery. The gap is particularly apparent to non-Pentecostals, that is, those who have not had a “Pentecostal experience.” How then can Pentecostalism communicate its central themes? How can their meaningfulness be preserved for future generations, in other words, how can we prevent a Pentecostal amnesia?

In 1993, Frank Macchia sought to establish the relation between human experience and the divine through a sacramental interpretation of glossolalia. Like others before him, Macchia tried to solve the problem by re-interpreting the temporal aspects of the Pentecostal experience and, so to speak, reversing the directionality in the corpus veritatum. Paul Tillich had emphasized that the relation between the human and the divine is realized from the divine initiative not from the human. In agreement with Karl Rahner, this meant that through sacramental signification, the divine presence is realized in the human temporality. Thus Macchia concludes that the “sacraments are understood now as contexts for a dynamic and personal divine/human encounter.” However, if sacramental expression is instrumental for this encounter, in which expression and how is encounter possible? In other words, can we understand the sacraments as the ordering principle of a Pentecostal corpus veritatum?

Throughout the modern Pentecostal-Roman Catholic dialogue we find agreement on the importance of the sacraments. Pentecostals

---

69 “Tongues as a Sign: Towards a Sacramental Understanding of Pentecostal Experience,” Pneuma 15:1 (Spring 1993), pp. 61-76.

emphasize the role of the Eucharist and of baptism in the life of the Church. Steve Land even speaks of the Eucharist as an occasion in worship to be converted, healed, sanctified and filled with the Spirit, that is, a manifestation of all four Pentecostal themes. Others have noted the importance of the footwashing, and the role of the laying on of hands in divine healing. Sacraments are, in fact, a temporal manifestation of the very mystery of Christ. For some Pentecostals, they are a real sign “for a real journey with a real destination”—a directionality from the human experience to the divine mystery. Many Pentecostals, however, are uncomfortable with controlled liturgical forms and most do not derive their ecclesial identity from the celebration of the sacraments. What then is their significance for Pentecostal identity?

---

The New Testament portrays sacramental rituals as an act of remembrance. Christ instructs us, “Do this in remembrance of me.” In the Old Testament we are reminded of the deeds of God in the earlier covenant. The Jewish liturgy of the Passover even suggests that “in every generation each is obliged to see herself or himself as one who has come out of Egypt.” However,

[m]emory, as in biblical usage, is more than a recalling to mind of the past. It is the work of the Holy Spirit linking the past with the present and maintaining the memory of that on which everything depends… Through the Spirit, therefore, the power of what is remembered is made present afresh, and succeeding generations appropriate the event commemorated.

The past experience of the divine mystery becomes a present reality in the celebration of God’s people. The past is not only remembered, it is kept alive and infused with new meaning. The sacraments offer Pentecostals what they have called for: to regard the historical roots of the movement no longer as the infancy but as the heart of the movement. In celebrating the sacraments, Pentecostals can remember and relive the work of God as it is recorded in God’s word and the history of the 83 Lee, “Pneumatological Ecclesiology,” p. 247. “For Pentecostals, the central element of worship is the preaching of the word…of secondary importance are participation in baptism and the Lord’s Supper.” See also “Perspectives on Koinonia,” quoted in Rusch, Deepening Communion, p. 416.

---

86 m. Pesah, X, 5.

Pentecostal people. The sacraments can provide structure, clarity, and expression to the central themes of Pentecostalism. This leads to my conclusion.

The concept of a corpus veritatum makes several important contributions to Pentecostal identity. First, it calls on Pentecostals to work out more precisely the distinctive features of the movement in order to more clearly express and present Pentecostalism. Second, the distinctive themes of Pentecostalism are essential for the life of the movement, yet Pentecostal identity reaches beyond the mere Pentecostal experience; the themes must be expressed and preserved in their right relationship to the foundation of Christian faith. Third, Pentecostal identity does not have to be created; it already exists. Pentecostals need no reinterpretation of the past but a re-evaluation of the present in light of the past. This re-evaluation is an act of remembrance (anamnēsis) that necessitates a corpus sacramentorum corresponding to the corpus veritatum. Pentecostals will have to re-evaluate the instrumental role of sacraments for a theological expression of Pentecostal identity. Sacraments, by the power of the Holy Spirit, “bring into our lives the life-giving action” of the mystery of Christ, and provide Pentecostals with the means to establish and preserve the Pentecostal essence and thus to theologically formulate and strengthen a global Pentecostal identity.

---

90 The role of sacraments for Christian identity in a postmodern context was also the theme of the recent 2nd International Leuven Encounters in Systematic Theology Conference, November 3-6, 1999, Leuven, Belgium.

91 This understanding can be found in the 1982 document of the Joint International Commission between the Roman Catholic Church and the Orthodox Church, “The Mystery of the Church and the Eucharist in the Light of the Mystery of the Holy Trinity,” One in Christ 19:2 (1983), pp. 188-97.

Spirit makes God visible and audible in the memorial of the past of the community were this memory is kept alive. The present, then, will be no longer only a reliving of the past—it will be the beginning of everything.
Pentecostalism and related charismatic Christian movements are among the fastest-growing religious denominations in the world. In 1980, 6 percent of all global Christians were Pentecostals. By 2015, 25 percent of global Christians were Pentecostal with the greatest concentrations in what's referred to as the "Global South" — largely impoverished regions in Africa, Latin America and Southeast Asia. In the case of Pentecostals, what was lost were the impressive spiritual powers and prophetic callings bestowed upon Christ's 11 remaining apostles in the New Testament book of Acts, says Mittelstadt. After Jesus was crucified and resurrected, he appeared to his disciples and told them to wait in Jerusalem "until ye be endued with power from on high" (Luke 24:49). Pentecostalism or Classical Pentecostalism is a Protestant Christian movement[1][2] that emphasises direct personal experience of God through baptism with the Holy Spirit. The term Pentecostal is derived from Pentecost, the Greek name for the Jewish Feast of Weeks. There are over 279 million Pentecostals worldwide, and the movement is growing in many parts of the world, especially the global South. Since the 1960s, Pentecostalism has increasingly gained acceptance from other Christian traditions, and Pentecostal beliefs concerning Spirit baptism and spiritual gifts have been embraced by non-Pentecostal Christians in Protestant and Catholic churches through the Charismatic Movement. Download Now. saveSave Christian Amnesia - Who in the World Are Pentecost For Later. 54 views. 0Up votes, mark as useful. 0Down votes, mark as not useful. Christian Amnesia - Who in the World Are Pentecostals - Wolfgang Vondey. Uploaded by. Pentecostals need to learn about themselves together in a global context. They may find that behind their different expressions lies a common foundation for a global Pentecostal identity. I want to suggest that the postmodern problem of Pentecostalism is one of memory. The identifiers of the past are no longer sufficient to adequately establish and preserve Pentecostal identity in the present. Pentecostals need an appropriate system that will allow them to determine and describe their global and ecumenical existence.